ABOUT ME

I have a background in both human-oriented fields, as well as technology and design research. I have a strong appreciation for culture and history, which guides my interest in aesthetics and everyday human experiences. These perspectives continue to inform my work within technological research and interaction design.

I am particularly interested in human behaviour and sensory experiences, both within the physical world and through technologically augmented environments. Alongside my practical and creative work, I have participated in academic research through writing, literature research, and hands-on development, which has strengthened my understanding of the human experience through both contextual and academic perspectives.
